Introduction.

THE scope of this work is somewhat larger than its title would seem to indicate, for it is intended to serve as a preliminary guide to the knightly families of England living in or about the time of the first Edward. The Catalogue is necessarily incomplete, and many more of such families might be discovered by searching other records, but it seems likely that at least a fair proportion of the men of that age who were Knights, or qualified for Knighthood, were at some time in their lives mentioned in Patent, Close, Fine, or Charter Rolls, or at their deaths in Inquisitions, or that their arms were described in heraldic lists or impressed upon Seals.

It was at first intended to confine the list of names to those of men spoken of as Knights during the reign of King Edward I, but as a large number of others not so alluded to held, nevertheless, the qualifying land, or occupied positions usually held by Knights, and as, moreover, many of King Edward's men had previously served his father or continued to serve his son, it seemed advisable to enlarge the period covered by the inquiry, and, in consequence, many Knights of Henry III and of Edward II are included in the Catalogue. A further reason for thus lengthening the period is that armorial bearings upon shields were at that time the special cognisance of Knights, so that it is almost certain that when these were used the men who used them were of knightly rank. Since, therefore, some of the most important descriptions or lists of arms were made or compiled before 1272, like those of Matthew Paris and Glover, or after 1307, like the Stepney, Parliamentary, and Boroughbridge Rolls, the men bearing these arms, as well as those on Seals throughout the whole period, could scarcely have been omitted without lessening the value of the Catalogue.

The number of Knights' Fees in England in 1166 was, by Dr. J. H. Round in his "Introduction of Knight Service into England," calculated at 5,000 or less, viz. 784 held by the Church, and 3,534 by such of the lay Barons as were included, with an allowance for omissions of the latter. The number a century later and during the following sixty years was probably not less, so that if we reckon 5,000 Fees as the normal number existing between the Barons' War of 1264-5 and the disturbances culminating at Boroughbridge in 1322, it follows that there should always have been in that period some 5,000 Knights in England capable of serving those Fees. There were, no doubt, times of slackness, when men omitted to take up the burden of Knighthood, but King Edward I engaged in several wars, in Wales, Scotland, and the Continent of Europe, and from time to time rounded up his men in no uncertain fashion by sending commissioners to every County to ascertain "who ought to be Knights and are not." Thus on 26 June 1278 he bade the Sheriff of Gloucester "distrain those of his bailiwick who have £20 p.a. in lands or a whole Knight's Fee worth £20 p.a., who hold in capite and ought to be knighted, to receive Knighthood before Christmas, and to cause the names of such men to be written in a roll by two Knights of the County and sent to the King" (C.R.). Or again: "The King has a right to distrain for Knighthood all who have £20 p.a. in lands or a Knight's Fee worth £20 p.a." This right was no new thing, for we read that on 16 Nov. 1224 a writ was issued ordering every layman of full age holding one or more Knight Fees and not yet a Knight, to take arms and be knighted before the end of Easter 1225. And on 7 June 1233 the lands of Roger de Somery were forfeited because he came not to the King to be knighted last Pentecost (Archæologia, xxxix, 203-4). King Edward I, it is true, did not always insist upon his right, as e.g. on 6 May 1285, when, for the good service done in Wales, he bade those having not merely £20 but at least £100 p.a. in lands to be knighted, and on 24 Nov. 1296, when the Justice of Chester was ordered to proclaim that all having £30 p.a. lands or a Knight's Fee worth that sum, and who ought to be Knights, shall take up Knighthood before Whitsuntide (C.R.). A good example of attempted distraint was furnished by Richard le Brod', who "holds £15 p.a. rents in the Liberty of the Cinque Ports by service of being doorward of Pevensey Castle, and 100 - p.a. rents in the socage without the Liberty, but the Sheriff was unable to distrain him to take the degree of Knighthood because all his beasts had been driven into the Liberty" (P.W. 26 June 1278). Many men, as will be seen, paid varying sums to defer Knighthood for a year or more, and some were excused for life, but it seems reasonable to suppose that the majority of those holding the qualifying land were at some time actually knighted. At any rate they were of the knightly class, and though some who were "not quite Who" are included in the Catalogue, the latter may be regarded as at least an imperfect guide to the Landed Gentry of England for the period which it embraces.

There was a great knighting at Whitsuntide 1306, when the King knighted his son Edward, and had bidden the Sheriffs to proclaim that "all who are not Knights, and wish to be so, shall come to London to receive from the King's Wardrobe the necessary gear, and receive Knighthood from him" (C.R. 6 Ap. 1306). For the feast that followed were ordered 500 qrs. of wheat, 500 qrs. of oats, 200 oxen, 400 sheep, 200 swine, 20 boars, and 20 brass or leaden vessels (C.R. 14 Ap. 1306). Another such knighting, for those who had not been able to come to Westminster, took place at Carlisle 2 Feb. 1307 (C.R.). The list given by Shaw in his Knights of England can largely be verified by other references, but certain entries quoted in the present Catalogue make it appear likely that at least a few of those named by him were already Knights before 22 May 1306.

Men holding certain offices seem to have usually been Knights, such as Sheriffs, Escheators, Constables of Castles, those summoned to Military Councils, many of the Judges, and probably all the Knights of the Shire. Several of the Fideles of Ireland, summoned in or about 1302, were certainly of knightly rank.

It should be remembered, in estimating the probable number of Knights living at that time in England, that besides the 5,000 capable of serving for that number of Fees, there must have been many disabled, infirm, and aged Knights, for these, unlike Sheriffs, Constables, and Escheators, retained their status for life, living on their own lands or sent to Religious Houses for hospitality and sustenance. The Knights sustained in their own persons the chief shock of battle and often, foremost fighting, fell, and doubtless there were supernumeraries and younger men preparing or ready to take their places. The large number who died leaving young children is evidence that war made great havoc in their ranks, and one can scarcely think that their active service lasted on the average more than ten or twelve years, in which case three times 5,000 may have served the first Edward during his reign. If this be so, it is clear that the Catalogue by no means exhausts the list even of those serving in his time.

During the period under review those who bore hereditary titles were the King, the Earls, and a very few of the Barons, such as those of Stafford and Greystoke. Baronies as tracts of land were numerous, and their holders were Barons, greater or lesser, but at least in the Rolls, if distinguished by any title, it is almost invariably Dominus, Sir, which was given to the Knights and to many of the clergy. We hear of Magnates, especially in Ireland, but these were merely the leading men, and the word was not used as a title. Dukes, Marquesses, and Viscounts were not created in England until a later date, and even the King's sons, until Edward II in his father's lifetime was made Prince of Wales, were not nominally distinguished above the rest. For convenience, however, in the Catalogue they are alluded to as e.g. "P. Edm.," and those of the Barons who were summoned by writ in 1295 and later are spoken of as "Barons," although strictly speaking these titles are an anachronism.

Among many thousands of references it may perhaps be allowed that mistakes are inevitable. Arms are sometimes attributed to the wrong men. The wide distribution of land, when an Earl might be found holding estates or rents in almost every County, and lesser men in several, makes it extremely difficult to decide whether a man holding land in Northumberland were the same as one of like name holding land, possibly in right of his wife, in Devonshire. The Parliamentary Roll, which usually names the County of a man whose arms it records, is not in that respect quite reliable, and occasionally there were so many men of the same surname and Christian name that the sorting of references is puzzling in the extreme. Thus between 1258 and 1327 there were eight or possibly ten John Giffards, sometimes indeed spoken of as of Brimsfield or elsewhere, but very often without such clue, so that to place them is matter of guesswork. No attempt has been made in the present work to decide the exact relationship of all the men bearing such names as Albini, Balliol, Beauchamp, Botiller, Breouse, and Brus, but it is likely that those who are interested in particular families will be able by careful consideration of probabilities, by examination of other volumes published by the Record Commissioners or local Societies, and by search in other directions to solve difficulties and to correct errors which they will detect here.

It may be useful to explain that the chief reasons for selecting from the many available sources of information the various Rolls and other works named below are, first, that these seem to be upon the whole the fullest and most generally useful, and secondly that for the period under review they have been calendared or summarised and printed, and thus made easily accessible.

The Patent Rolls, which begin 1201, contain a record of the patent, i.e. open or public letters of the King or his ministers directed to various persons, and include grants of land or of offices, deeds of various kinds, and an enormous collection of miscellaneous matter, so that it is not too much to say that practically every parish in England and almost every person of consequence was at some time mentioned therein. It would in fact be futile to attempt to write the history of any parish in this country, or to tell the story of any ancient family without reference to them.

The Close Rolls, dating from 1204, and also largely calendared and printed, contain a summary of the closed, sealed up, or more personal letters sent out in the same way, much of the information being of like character with that found in the Patent Rolls, but with the addition of a good deal that might be described as family history, since they not infrequently state that certain persons have desired matters of interest to themselves to be entered upon the Close Roll, as, e.g. when Sir Richard de Cornwall had lost his seal through the cutting of his purse (C.R. Nov. 1286). In this respect they give a specially human touch to the records.

The Fine Rolls are in the main, though sometimes indirectly, concerned with the passage of money to the King. They record the deaths of tenants in capite, when death duties in the form of fees paid for "relief" became due, and they note the appointment of many officials, such as sheriffs, constables of castles, and guardians of estates, many of whom gave money for their privileges, besides the sums exacted for breaches of the law and for various forms of licence. The origin of the term is interesting, for just as at the close of a legal process to-day it is usual for money to pass, to the State, to the successful litigant, or at least to the legal advisers, so at that time when the defendant "finem fecit cum Rege," finished his dispute, he usually appeased the King's wrath by a monetary payment, to which therefore the term Finis became permanently attached. The Fine Rolls are particularly valuable as showing what offices men held, in what fashion they ended their real or fictitious disputes with the King, and when they themselves finished.

The Charter Rolls contain a record of charters of the King or of others, grants of land or of such privileges as markets and fairs, and much other information, and are particularly useful to those engaged in tracing the history of parishes or of manors.

The Scutage Rolls, not very numerous, note the payment or the excusing of sums payable for knightly service, and show in what counties a Knight held lands, and in which campaigns he served.

The Welsh Rolls, specially useful to those interested in the Principality, contain a good deal of information about local customs, and a record of services undertaken during the conquest and occupation of Wales by King Edward I.

The Inquisitions record enquiries made at the deaths of tenants in capite as to what lands they held, of whom, by what tenure, their value, the names and ages of the next heirs and sometimes of sub-tenants, with occasional reference to marriage settlements and other family matters. They include also Proofs of Age, with the names of many who were present at or who remembered the birth enquired into, and not a little amusing testimony.

The Parliamentary Writs contain summonses to Parliament, to Councils, or to military service, and many other matters. Most of the knights about whom anything is known, and many lesser men are named in these.

The Papal Registers, entries in which relating to this country were extracted by W. H. Bliss, have many references to men of knightly rank, but many more, as is natural, relating to the clergy.

The Complete Peerage, originally brought out by G. E. Cockayne, but the edition now in progress by the Hon. Vicary Gibbs, traces the descent of baronies by writ and other peerages, and has valuable notes.

Of the various Rolls and Lists of Arms less need be said. The quaint Norman-French of the Parliamentary and Boroughbridge Rolls is in the main quoted in the Catalogue, and is often explained by the wording of other Rolls. None can be spoken of as really official, although perhaps the first-named approaches that character, and none is infallible, as is evident from the variety of their records. The magnificent volume of Matthew Paris (Royal MS. 14, c. vii) is thought to have been written and illuminated by Matthew himself, and describes or depicts the arms of many persons living or dying in his time. The Carlaverock roll is quaint and flattering. Camden records many foreign coats. Dering is somewhat unreliable. Charles and St. George, nearly contemporary, are much alike.

The Seals catalogued by De Gray Birch go back to an early period and are very numerous, although they only include those preserved in the British Museum. Those in his list which are heraldic and of private persons down to 1327 are included in the present work, as well as those in the various Rolls, since although in many cases they have not been identified by other references it appears likely that the men who used them were of knightly rank.

Among important sources of information which for reasons of space and time it has not been found practicable to include, may be mentioned the following:

Calendarium Genealogicum	Kirkby's Quest
Catalogue of Ancient Deeds	Dugdale's Monasticon
Dictionary of National Biography	Originalia Rolls
Feudal Aids	Pipe Rolls
Hundred Rolls	Red Book of Exchequer
Inquisitiones ad quod damnum	Testa de Nevill
Inquisitiones quo warranto

No one studying the history of a parish or an ancient family would omit the Subsidy Rolls, some of which for various counties are in print, and, of course, Episcopal Registers, such as those published by the Canterbury and York Society, the Exeter Registers, and others, containing reference to the patronage of benefices, private oratories, and many other things, are extremely useful. These are, no doubt, well known to most students, who also are well acquainted with W. Rye's "Records and Record Searching," and kindred works.

In the present volume it has not been easy to decide under which letter to place local surnames beginning with a vowel, seeing that the De has in some cases become merged in the place-name and in others has remained separate. The method adopted has been to follow what appears to have been the general usage during the period under review, but the decision is necessarily somewhat arbitrary. Thus Daubeney, although sometimes appearing thus in the 13th century, is much more frequently found as De Albini or De Albeniaco, and consequently will be found under the heading Albini, but, on the other hand, De Arci, De Aincurt, De Oilli, De Anvers, and De Evereux had then almost disappeared from public documents, and will consequently be found as D'Arcy, D'Eyncourt, D'Oyley, Danvers, and Devereux, in the Catalogue. A corresponding problem occurs in such cases as L'Engleys, or those in which H presented the same difficulty to our forefathers that it does to many persons to-day, for the Huddleston of Cumberland occasionally became Odeleston elsewhere.

In order to include as many names and entries as possible, abbreviations are freely used, most of which explain themselves. To write "for K." instead of "on the King's service" may seem disrespectful to Edw. I, whom all Englishmen honour, but its constant repetition saves many pages of print, and if he could have read them the great King would have found endless abbreviations in the rolls of his own chroniclers. "Comr" is, of course, Commissioner. "Overlord at ——" does not necessarily imply that the man referred to was a tenant in capite, but merely that some other man held lands or rents of him, and shows in what place or places his property was situated. In the case of the best-known men, to whom there are perhaps hundreds of references, many of the less important of these are omitted, and the general intention has been to exhibit as far as possible a man's family relationships, the extent and position of his lands, the offices he held, and such personal notices as tend to show him a really human figure.

It will be remarked that lawlessness was present even under the firm hand of Edward the Lawgiver, though much more so under those of his father and son. Quite distinguished men found it difficult to avoid a term in gaol or the temporary confiscation of their lands, for if they did not commit homicide "in self-defence" or "by misadventure," they seem to have been unable to withstand the temptation of trespassing after the King's deer. The penalty was severe, but good service in Wales or Scotland not seldom availed for complete pardon even of the worst offences. Upon the whole it will be found that a certain light is thrown by these brief entries upon public and private life in England at an extremely interesting period, but for fuller radiance it will be necessary to examine the Rolls themselves and such other sources of information as are known to students of history.

On the next page will be found a List of Works consulted with the abbreviations used in referring to them.
